APPLE TO TESTIFY MARCH 1

1 FBI Director James Comey and Apple Senior Vice President and general counsel Bruce Sewell will testify at a March 1 congressional hearing on encryption issues, the House of Representatives Judiciary Committee said in a statement Thursday. The hearing comes amid a dispute between the tech giant and the government over unlocking an iPhone used by one of the San Bernardino, California, shooters. REUTERS

BULGER MASTURBATING

2 James "Whitey" Bulger was punished in prison for masturbating in his cell, Boston.com reported. Federal inmates are prohibited from all sexual activity. Bulger was caught in the act last June, and the punishment was 30 days in solitary. The incident was dug up by the Boston Globe, which found documents indicating Bulger was caught in the act with the lights on. He defended himself by saying, "I'm 85 years old. My sex life is over." He also reportedly claimed he was just applying medicated powder to his irritated genitals. REUTERS

ZIKA VACCINE PATHWAY

3 President Barack Obama expressed optimism Thursday about the possibilities for a vaccine against Zika, a virus he said turned out to be not especially complicated. "We just had a meeting about Zika, where we actually think there's a promising pathway for diagnostics and vaccines on this," Obama said during a panel discussion about precision medicine. "It's not a real complicated virus, apparently." REUTERS

COP BUSTED FOR PILLS

4 A Salem police officer has been arrested after authorities said he purchased a bag of oxycodone pills from a street-level Lynn drug dealer. On Wednesday, Salem patrolman Matthew Scialdone, 35, was arrested while off duty before his afternoon shift when a Lynn drug task force observed a transaction between a motorist and two pedestrians, the Salem News reported. ## ARREST IN 1989 HOMICIDE

5 A Massachusetts man wanted for a 27-year-old Philadelphia homicide was arrested Wednesday and is expected to be returned to Pennsylvania. Vicheth Prak, 43, was arrested by Lowell police accompanied by Philadelphia detectives, the Boston Globe reported. No specifics on the crime were given other than it being a homicide that took place in 1989. On Thursday, Prak was to be arraigned in Lowell District Court as a fugitive from justice, WTRF reported in a related article. JASON NUCKOLLS

MISSING TEETH ROBBER

6 Boston police are searching for a man identified as a person of interest in an armed robbery investigation, the department said Thursday. Ongoing incidents of pedestrians being robbed with a 12-inch kitchen knife have been reported downtown, police said in a blog post. The department posted two pictures of a man to its site Thursday. # Art to brighten South Station

A permanent installation, sponsored by the Women's Transportation Seminar, arrives in spring 2017.

SPENCER BUELL
spencer.buell@metro.us

After years of planning, months of searching and several public meetings, a Brooklyn artist with an eye for geography has been picked to install a permanent art piece at South Station.

The project that will grace the transit hub is Ellen Harvey's "Network," a mosaic of hundreds of color-coded glass pieces: subways are in black, rail in dark gray, roads in light gray and water in silver — all of them seeming to sprout from the historic T station.

> "Compelling art enhances the appearance and impact of our stations, giving vibrancy to public spaces." MBTA General Manager Frank DePaola

The role of the T stop in the harbor city's history, and the web of squiggly lines that its story left behind, are what inspired the piece, the U.K.-native and Harvard alumna told Metro in an interview.

"Each layer has a different color and they all sort of converge on South Station in all these different ways," she said. "It's an interesting kind of interplay between the natural situation of the city and how it ended up where it is."

Right now, it's destined for the angled ceiling at the Red Line entryway to the station by the Federal Reserve building, though its final location could change.

Harvey said she's obsessed with maps and the way they serve as historical archives of politics, business and nature: how livestock paths became roads, how bodies of water became shopping districts, how highways and subways replaced rivers.

"There is no romance in your soul if you don't love a map," she said.

Harvey's pitch was among nearly 200 applicants from 32 states and nine countries vying for the chance to create a piece of art for the space.

The piece is a gift to the city from the Boston wing of the Women's Transportation Seminar International to celebrate "Women in Motion."

The stairwell to the Red Line near South Station will soon be home to an art installation by Brooklyn-based artist Ellen Harvey. NICOLAUS CZARNECKI

Harvey's interpretation of that prompt is subtle.

She said she decided against making something that was too literal about the history of women in transit — after all, commuters only have a few seconds to pass by on their way to their trains.

Because of this, she plans to place an image of a mermaid peering through a surveyor's tripod near the bottom of the piece, she said.

"She's not a traditional mermaid," Harvey said. "She's a little shout-out to all the women who have been involved in making all these transportation networks function."

The mosaic will likely make its debut in spring 2017, project manager Jean Mineo told Metro. Installation will take about a week, she said.

"Network" will be Harvey's fourth project in a city transit stop. She also has two permanent installations at stations in New York and one in Chicago.

WTS, which recently celebrated its 35th anniversary, aims to raise $150,000 for the project.

HEY, AMERICA — ARE YOU SURE TRUMP IS THE ONE?

THE FOREMAN OPINION

TOM FOREMAN

I don't want you to think I'm trying to run your life. We've been family for a long time now, and we'll still be family afterward no matter what you decide. But you seem to be getting serious about this guy, Donald Trump, becoming our president. And I want to make sure you are thinking this through before you commit.

First, let's go over the positives. He is certainly self-confident. I've frankly never met anyone more so. You may recall the other night at dinner when I asked if he'd like some salad and he not only refused but offered to punch me in the mouth. Now that's decisive.

He is well off. No one seems to know precisely how much money he has, but it appears to be a lot. I mean most of the guys you date ride around on buses — he landed his helicopter in our back yard! (Remind me, btw, to go by the garden center and pick up some new shrubs. You might ask Mr. Moneybags if he'll cover the cost of that. Just saying.)

And he inspires people. The other day a guy told me that your beau has motivated him to consider applying for Canadian citizenship, and he wasn't even considering it until they met.

But what do you really know about this guy of yours? He brags about never having been in a relationship like this before, and honestly I can see why that is attractive. Many of your previous suitors have let you down, even that one from a few years ago who promised he'd "change" everything. However, all the unknowns about your new fellow bring uncertainties.

Sure, your little friend Minnesota ran off with that guy, Jesse, for a while, and we all remember California's fling with Arnold. But we're talking about all of you, America, and before you toss aside all of your more traditional dates, I just want you to be sure this is the serious candidate you want for your serious matters ahead.

Again, I stress that this is your decision. Our family has been great for a long time because we are all free to make our own choices. I have the greatest faith that your decision will be right or we will eventually make it right.

And you know, America, I will love you just the same.

BRIEF

UN to announce new round of Syria talks: envoy

The United Nations will name a date on Friday for Syria's warring parties to return to the negotiating table for a second round of talks, U.N. Syria envoy Staffan de Mistura said on Thursday.

De Mistura abruptly aborted a first round of talks Feb. 3 and urged countries in the International Syria Support Group (ISSG), led by the United States and Russia, to do more preparatory work.

They met in Munich and pushed for a cease-fire deal, resulting in an agreement on a "cessation of hostilities" that President Bashar al-Assad's government and the opposition have both said they could support.

De Mistura said he would brief the U.N. Security Council on Friday and then announce a date for a new round of talks. REUTERS

BRIEF

U.S. to submit "significant" sanctions resolution on North Korea

The United States will propose to the U.N. Security Council on Thursday what diplomats said would be a significant expansion of sanctions against North Korea over its latest nuclear test.

"Ambassador [Samantha] Power intends to submit ... a draft sanctions resolution in response to [North Korea's] recent nuclear test and subsequent proscribed ballistic missile launch," spokesman Kurtis Cooper said in a statement.

The resolution, if adopted, would call for the blacklisting of more than two dozen individuals and entities, tighten restrictions on North Korean financing and banking and add tough measures on cargo inspections aimed at catching sanctions violations, diplomats said.

"We look forward to working with the council on a strong and comprehensive response to [North Korea's] latest series of tests aimed at advancing their nuclear weapons program," Cooper said.

Western diplomats told Reuters that limiting North Korean access to international ports was among the measures Washington pushed Beijing to accept.

North Korea has been under U.N. sanctions since 2006 because of its multiple nuclear tests and rocket launches.

China and the United States have differed on how strongly to respond to Pyongyang's most recent test, with Washington urging harsh punitive measures and Beijing emphasizing dialogue and milder U.N. steps confined to non-proliferation. The two veto powers had been negotiating on the text for seven weeks following Pyongyang's fourth test on Jan. 6. REUTERS

BEING ANTI-POLICE BRUTALITY DOESN'T MAKE ONE ANTI-COP

THE ERNEST OPINION

ERNEST OWENS
@MrErnestOwens

The first time I wrote a Facebook post about my disappointment in the number of slain unarmed black teens due to police shootings – it was met with harsh criticism.

Either the spouses or children of cops on my timeline immediately got defensive, telling me that I should "mourn for the cops," that "all police aren't bad" and I'm "ungrateful."

But since when was I not allowed to consider the life of those who died at the hands of police?

How was grieving the death of another and calling for justice an affront to those lawful officers who don't abuse their power? Given the recent, highly publicized transgressions made by some police organizations, you would think they felt above reproach.

This week, police branches across the country are boycotting Beyoncé's world tour given the recent awareness she has brought to instances of police brutality. The Miami Fraternal Order of the Police has been adamant on not ensuring proper security on their end for the famous entertainer because they want folks to "Back the Blue, Boycott Beyoncé."

Sgt. Ed Mullins, president of the Sergeants Benevolent Association in New York City, recently said, "[Beyoncé] made a statement and now law enforcement is making a statement."

If the mission is to "protect and serve," there shouldn't be a double standard when it comes to those who practice their First Amendment right of free speech.

So because police feel offended by a certain message, that means they now can take away their ability to protect certain citizens? Yeah, no. When officers get defensive about those who question the unlawful behavior of some cops, it suggests that they are either naïve about police brutality or nonchalant about it.

To reprimand those who do call out the injustices when they occur is undemocratic. It reduces the power of civilians and taxpayers who fund the defense of their communities and heightens their fear of those that are expected to protect them.

How much has society allowed for other police chiefs or officers to critique the nature of those in their department that have obstructed justice? Not a lot. So we shouldn't feel inclined to misrepresent those who speak out in a way that doesn't actually inflict harm. Whether it's myself or Beyoncé, we should all agree that free speech matters.

THE FUN STARTS HERE

Aaron Paul goes on a ride along

For "Triple 9," the "Breaking Bad" actor got to revisit the underbelly of society.

MATT PRIGGE
matt.prigge@metro.us

Acting always entails research, but "Triple 9" is a different story. In the new thriller, Aaron Paul plays a disgraced ex-cop who's part of a gang of thieves filled out by former mercenaries and corrupt police officers. That meant doing ride alongs with the LAPD through East L.A. What he saw could have come right out of a movie, and not just "Triple 9" itself.

"We pulled over this guy — I forget his name, but it was something that's terrifying, like 'Psycho,'" the actor, 36, recalls. The cop arrested him, finding a gun whose serial number had been shaved off. He already had two strikes against him, meaning he'd be in jail for the rest of his life. When they got back to the station, Paul wound up interviewing him, despite finding him to be the scariest person he'd ever seen. Then he got a surprise: "Turns out he was a big fan of 'Breaking Bad.'"

Every cast member from "Triple 9" has stories like this; Paul recalls one from co-star Casey Affleck's own ride along, which involved a stand-off that ended with a perp leaping out of a window holding an infant in one hand, an AK-47 in the other. For Paul such tales stressed how real the film is — how the worst things we see in "Triple 9" and "Breaking Bad" oftentimes really happen.

Paul came away with a lot of respect for cops — he emphatically recommends doing your own ride along — but also an understanding that there's no clean line between good and bad.

"You would see these little kids, 7 or 8 years old, on their bikes. They'd see us pulling up, and they'd jump off their bikes and run into a store," he recalls. Paul would watch the cops run after them and come back with proof they were selling drugs for a gang. "These kids don't have a choice. It's all they know. For the adults, it's all they know. They've grown up on the streets their whole lives."

For Paul, "Triple 9" isn't just another gig about the underworld; it's a film where he gets to again play an addict. And Paul didn't want to be trapped forever in the "Breaking Bad" world.

"I definitely got a lot scripts sent my way for drugged-out characters. That's the last thing I wanted to do," Paul says. "Triple 9" was an exception, and not only because of its comically big-name cast (in addition to Affleck, there's Chiwetel Ejiofor, Anthony Mackie, Norman Reedus, Woody Harrelson and Kate Winslet, playing a Russian mafioso). The director, John Hillcoat, has a reputation for dark, brutal films about violence, including "The Proposition" and "Lawless." Paul knew it would be an honest but humane look at the moral gray zone. No character, from cops to robbers, is all bad or all good.

"You're not sure who you're supposed to be rooting for. You're kind of rooting for everybody, and you don't know why," Paul says.

Of course, returning to a project about a sometime junkie was nostalgic, too. "It brought back a lot of fond memories of smoking meth onscreen," he jokes.

Wolfmother's cool with being 'retro'

The Aussie band's back on tour to promote "Victorious."

RACHEL RACZKA
@rachelraczka
rachel.raczka@metro.us

Wolfmother's more than a decade of reinvention always cycles back to years beyond those they've been active. The Grammy-winning Australian rock band have often been lauded as retro, echoing the stoner-metal likes of Black Sabbath — but meant in the most complimentary way possible. Their fourth studio album, "Victorious," dropped last Friday from Universal and the band kicked off a world tour Wednesday in Minneapolis. We caught frontman Andrew Stockdale to chat the album and what it's like to be "retro."

This album release has been pretty digitally involved. You even have an app to color in the album art.

Yeah, people love that kind of thing. My daughter's done it about 50 times. She thinks she's going to win some sort of competition for it! It's interesting how interactive things have become, and honestly some of their [submissions] look good, if not better than the actual cover.

Is it weird having this kind of access between you and your fans?

It's funny because [social media] means so much now and defines you. First it was MySpace, so you'd get a million followers on MySpace and then no one was on MySpace. Then you're like, "I have 30,000 followers on Twitter," but then they're like, "No one cares about Twitter." You're constantly trying to feature the latest social media thing and I don't think that's a fair assessment of a band, or the value of their music. Sometimes you see something on YouTube but then you see it only has 150 views and you're like, "I still like it, but maybe I shouldn't because no one [else] is watching."

So has social media been a good or a bad thing for you?

You have to participate and you have to be a part of it. And it's good because it's given artists more power in promoting shows and their music, but it can also do your head in as well. If your mood is constantly guarded by someone's comments [online], you have to be on an up-and-down emotional roller coaster or you have to learn to ignore it. Speaking of YouTube, the "Victorious" video is one to watch on repeat.

CALEB COPPOLA

Where did the concept come from?
We had a few ideas pitched to us and this one had the tongue-in-cheek sort of comical '60s kitsch thing happening. That made the "Victorious" scene friendlier because we didn't have to be the oppressive force where there will be winners and losers.

In the song you specifically say "She will be victorious," but who is she?
She's the mythical character in the song, but I have no idea who it is specifically. It just sounded good. I don't know why.

The album's been out for about a week, have you peeked at any reviews?
I haven't read anything yet, to this point. My manager sent through reviews, and I said "Are they generally good or bad?" I'll read through them at some point.

With this album — and the ones before it — you get called "retro" quite a bit. How do you take that?
I think it's a compliment. Everything's connected to the past, and we're all influenced from people before us and how they approached things in their style. I feel good about being called retro. I don't see it as a criticism at all.

SANDOVAL AND RAMIREZ IN NEED OF SOME ATTITUDE ADJUSTMENTS

OPINION

@dannypicard

Pablo Sandoval showed up to Red Sox spring training in less-than-impressive shape. GETTY IMAGES

It all comes back to production.

That's why the arrival of Pablo Sandoval and Hanley Ramirez to spring training was met with so much outrage. At least, that's why I was furious with them over the weekend, when they both showed up to Fort Myers oozing the commitment level of a duo that didn't have all that much to prove.

I mean, those were some of the first words out of Sandoval's mouth.

"I don't got nothing to prove," he told reporters on Sunday, his first day in camp.

That couldn't be further from the truth when you sign a five-year, $95 million contract and finish your first season with the last-place Boston Red Sox hitting .245 with an OPS of .658, which was the 12th-worst OPS in Major League Baseball last year.

Sandoval has plenty to prove in a Red Sox uniform while making that kind of money. So you would think he'd at least make it sound like he's committed to improving upon a brutal 2015. Because he certainly didn't look the part.

And I get it, Sandoval has always been a big dude. Don't waste your time tweeting me the photos. After all, I've defended the guy more than anyone else in this town over the last calendar year.

But let's face it, had Sandoval showed us a better attitude this week, perhaps his weight wouldn't be as big a story. In fact, forget the attitude and the weight. Had Sandoval actually produced last year, this column would probably be about what the Celtics didn't do at last Thursday's NBA trade deadline or what the Bruins should do at this Monday's NHL trade deadline.

Same thing goes for Ramirez. He signed a four-year, $88 million deal with the Red Sox and also had a horrible first year in Boston, hitting .249 with an OPS of .717. While his obesity wasn't an issue when he reported to spring training last week — several days earlier than he was obligated to arrive — Ramirez decided the first "optional" weekend for positional players would be a good time to head down to Miami.

Unbelievable. Especially considering that Ramirez is expected to play first base this season, a position he's never played before.

Some have called my fury an overreaction. Well, had either player actually earned their paychecks last season, I might tend to agree. But both Sandoval and Ramirez entered spring training as if they each hit .300 last year, played Gold Glove-caliber defense and helped the Red Sox to the playoffs.

Reminder: None of those things are true.

In fact, all of those things are pretty much the complete opposite of what happened last year in Boston. So, yeah, like I said, it all comes back to production.

When your everyday corner infielders make a combined $40 million, the expectation is that your combined RBI total will be more than 100, your OPS will be respectable, and your defense will be good enough where it won't cost you enough games to keep you at the bottom of the AL East standings.

The Red Sox are paying Sandoval and Ramirez to put in the effort, show a certain level of commitment and have a sense of pride to play for one of the most historic franchises in all of sports. More importantly, they're paying Sandoval and Ramirez to help the team win, something they didn't help do last year.

And at the end of the day, that's all we really care about. Winning. If you don't win, we'll know why. And we'll expect you to fix it, or do everything you can to try. So, yes, Sandoval and Ramirez do, in fact, have something to prove.

It would be nice if they at least acknowledged it.

Aries Participating in events that mean something to you will give you the strength to make personal changes. Put your plans in motion and don't look back.

Taurus Initiate what you want to see happen. Don't be afraid to do things differently. It's your uniqueness that will attract attention and help you get things done.

Gemini Live, love and laugh. No matter what you do, make your presence felt and your input meaningful. Walk away from negativity, bad influences and unfair situations.

Cancer Put in extra hours working toward something that will help you stand out or beat any challenge or competition you face. Don't give in to emotional blackmail.

Leo Make changes to your living quarters. Voice your thoughts, discuss your intentions and make a plea to a loved one to help make your dreams come true.

Virgo You can enjoy life without spending money or getting involved in someone else's risky affairs. Expand your mind or take part in something that is geared to your benefit.

Libra Emotions will surface if you let someone push you around. If you make plans to do something with someone who's supportive, greater self-awareness and confidence will unfold.

Scorpio Explore new interests or give a unique spin to a project or pastime. A chance to reconnect with someone you enjoyed working with in the past will also contribute to your success.

Sagittarius You'll face opposition if you don't live up to your promises. Have an explanation ready and an alternative solution in place. Protect your reputation and stick to the truth.

Capricorn High energy coupled with interesting ideas will capture others' attention. An unexpected emotional response will lead to a better plan. Don't feel the need to act in haste.

Aquarius Added discipline will pay off. Don't let someone who is disgruntled or negative stand between you and victory. Put yourself first and celebrate your success with a loved one.

Pisces Take a different approach to handling your money and you will make headway. Get together with someone from your past who can help you revisit old dreams. EUGENIA LAST
